

A determined, amateur chef once worked for a marvellous restaurant in London called Rhyme. She was apparently so good that the important food critics often found it difficult to accommodate any criticism in their reviews. They regularly had to ask their secretaries to look up new words in dictionaries so that their reviews would contain more varied and interesting language. According to her curious colleagues, this brilliant and sincere chef would sacrifice lots of her leisure time to ensure that she definitely achieved the best tasting food each time she cooked.

However, there was a group of ancient male chefs who did not appreciate that an individual woman was doing so well and were desperate to interrupt her rhythm and ultimate rise to fame. Their mischievous minds worked together to develop a devious plan that would interfere with some of her signature dishes - in particular her award winning dish of 'Potatoes Royale with Shoulder of Lamb accompanied with seasonal vegetables'. They were not aggressive men, but it was probably the pressure of the lightning pace within the food industry that caused them to react in this negative way.