

The embarrassing and awkward truth about our environment is that it has become damaged and bruised because of our existence and inability to look after our physical surroundings. We are all familiar with reports (the twelfth one has just been published) about global warming, especially the thorough explanations that tell us about different categories that include rising temperatures and the overall average increase in sea levels. Many environmentalists, flexing their persuasive muscles, have stated that there have been insufficient opportunities made available by major governments to thoroughly address these important issues and occupy necessary time within their parliaments. However, committees that have been set up by some governments have suggested that many of these claims have been unnecessarily exaggerated and the outlook is not as disastrous as some people have stated. Environmentalist soldiers are trying to prevent the environment becoming a rather large cemetery, and can often be seen gathering a variety of pieces of equipment. They then use these to create a nuisance with their neighbours by trying to persuade them to develop an excellent system at a bargain price to help the environment. However it never occurs to these so called soldiers, that they are actually doing more harm to the environment than good. One person recently commented, "It makes me sick to my stomach every time the doorbell or phone rings because I don't know what I am going to be asked to do next. There are so many new symbols for recycling to look for as well as what to attach to what when we throw items away."
